

Home education and additional support for learning

This factsheet explains:

- what the law says about home education
- the local authority's responsibilities to children who are home educated
- when permission is needed to home educate.

Home education and the law

Your child has a right to an education, and their views should be listened to when any decisions are made that will significantly affect them and their education.

You must provide your child with an education that is suitable to their age, ability and aptitude from the age of five until they turn 16. Most parents do this by sending their child to school, but you can choose to educate your child at home.

If you choose to home educate, your local authority must be satisfied that you can provide a suitable education for your child.

What support does the local authority have to give my child if I home educate them?

The local authority does not have a legal duty to provide any support for learning to your child if you are home educating them, as they will no longer be responsible for their education.

They might agree to do so in some circumstances, but it is important to check with the local authority what support they will provide, if any, before going ahead with a decision to home educate.

Do I need permission to home educate my child?

If your child is already enrolled at school, you need to get the local authority's permission to take your child out of school to home educate them. The local authority must not refuse permission to home educate unless they have good reason to do so – for example if they are worried about your child's welfare, or do not think you can give them the education and support they need.

If your child is not enrolled at a school, for example if:

- they have not yet started either their primary school or secondary school, or
- you have moved into a different local authority area and they have not started school in the new area then you do not need permission from the local authority.

How do I ask for permission to home educate?

Most local authorities have a contact person or team that consider home education requests. You can find out who to contact in your area on your local authority's website, or by contacting the local authority's education department.

The local authority will need to be satisfied that you can provide your child with an 'efficient and suitable' education at home, so you will need to provide some information about how you will do this in your request. The local authority might ask you to give more detailed information if they feel they need it to make a decision.

The education authority may ask you to provide information about things such as:

- how your child's education will help to prepare them for life in modern society and achieve their full potential
- your approach to home educating your child and how enthusiastic and committed you are to home education
- how much the education you intend to provide supports your child's needs, attitudes and aspirations
- the kinds of resources and materials your child will have access to
- how your child will have opportunities to interact with other children and adults, and have an appropriate level of physical activity

- how your child will be involved in a broad spectrum of activities and be stimulated by their learning experiences
- how you will cater for your child's additional support needs.

You do not need to have any formal training or qualifications to home educate your child.

The local authority should aim to decide within six weeks of receiving your request to home educate, though this may take longer in some circumstances. The local authority should not unreasonably refuse permission to home educate.

If the local authority refuses permission, there is no formal right of appeal. However, you may get the opportunity to resubmit your request with further information. You can also ask if the local authority can review their decision. If you feel the local authority has been unreasonable in turning down your request, you could also consider making a formal complaint.

Do I have to report to the local authority about the education I am giving my child?

The law does not say how local authorities should monitor the education you are giving your child, but they do have to be satisfied that it is suitable to their age, ability and aptitude. Usually, this means that local authorities will ask parents who are home educating to update them at least once a year.

If they have concerns about the education you are providing, the local authority must check whether it is suitable for your child by either meeting you or asking you to provide information in writing.

In exceptional circumstances, if the local authority does not think you are able to provide a suitable education for your child and do not think this can be resolved, they can make an attendance order requiring your child to go to school.

I want to home educate my child because they are not being supported at school

Home education should be a positive choice. If your child is at school, the local authority must provide them with the support they need to fully benefit from their education. If you are unhappy with the level of support your child is getting, you can raise your concerns with their school or local authority to try and resolve these issues. If your child's current school cannot meet their needs, the local authority should explore other ways to provide the support. Home education should not be used as an alternative to the local authority providing your child with the support they need in school.

Find out more in our factsheet on Avoiding and solving problems.

Can my child have a mixture of home and school education?

The law does not cover this kind of arrangement, so this is a complicated issue. Arrangements for a mixture of home and school education are known as ‘flexi-schooling’. This would mean that:

- you and the local authority agree to have joint responsibility for educating your child
- your child would attend school some of the time (this may be for certain days or parts of the day, or for certain subjects), and be educated at home the rest of the time.

As the law does not say anything about this kind of arrangement, there is no specific right to ask for flexi-schooling for your child. Local authorities and schools should consider requests for flexi-schooling on a case by case basis. It is their decision whether they can support the arrangement.

Flexi-schooling is different to part-time education, where the local authority has full responsibility for providing a pupil with an education, but a decision has been made that is in their best interests to only attend school some of the time for a short period. This might be due to ill health or may be a temporary arrangement while more support or a different school placement is arranged. Find out more in our factsheet on School attendance.

Where can I find out more?

Home education guidance (2008)

www.gov.scot/publications/home-education-guidance

This is the Scottish Government’s guidance on home education. It explains the law on home education in detail, including the rights and responsibilities of parents and local authorities.

Schoolhouse www.schoolhouse.org.uk

Schoolhouse is Scotland’s national home education support charity. They provide information, advice and support for families who wish to home educate their children.

How Enquire can help

Enquire can help you understand your child's rights to additional support for learning and how to work in partnership with their school or nursery to make sure your child gets the support they need.

Enquire can:

- explain your child's rights to additional support for learning
- listen to any questions and concerns
- advise you on the way forward
- help you find local education and support services.

You can contact our helpline on 0345 123 2303 or info@enquire.org.uk
Access to interpreters is available.

You can also find lots more information about additional support for learning, including our full range of publications, at www.enquire.org.uk

The information on our website is available in over 100 languages and with a range of accessibility tools, such as text-to-speech.

Reach is our website for children and young people. Reach helps pupils to understand their rights to feel supported, included, listened to and involved in decisions at school: www.reach.scot

Enquire is also a partner in the My Rights, My Say service. My Rights, My Say supports children aged 12-15 with additional support needs to exercise their rights to be involved in decisions about their support in school:
www.myrightsmysay.scot

Enquire factsheet: Home education and additional support for learning

© Enquire February 2020

Enquire is funded by the Scottish Government and managed by Children in Scotland

